WINTERTIME FASHION TRENDS

An outline appears just past the hand, suggesting the possibility of a door to somewhere else. The fox, not one to lead the room in coordinated meditative stretching, bolts for the door, hoping to find some semblance of an exit around the hand's bend. What's the difference between an escape and an exit – one could ask – and could this barely defined shape serve as either? We must compartmentalize what defines us, and what creates a version of us we'd rather not know; can you ever simply be a fox jumping over a dog you once understood?

“NEW FACE NORTH FACE”

The fox and the dog free-fall off the edge into nothing, which is to say, they were fine. Landing promptly on the other side of the world, they look up into what is somehow a giant hand, impossibly looking back at them. The hand bends toward them without beckoning, and the dog and fox survey their new landscape, the under-pool – or their second world. Flat, gleaming, and forever, this place serves as a canvas for whatever happens next. The mother of all creation in one single moment, this hand.

ARCTIC

Downtown Greenville has never been more important to the food and beverage zeitgeist than it is right now. The rapid development of the cities' waterfront district has helped create a booming cultural movement and a rush of new businesses.

The latest entry into this ever-growing landscape is Ricos, a Latin American take on hawker-style street food from south east asia. That might sound like a confusing mouthful but let us be the first to tell you that you are going to want a mouthful of what they are serving.

We stopped by the restaurant, located on Jones Branch Dr just passed the old supermarket, for a Friday happy hour and the place was bumping. The atmosphere was lively, filled with the beats of the latest reggaeton hits and the smell of grilled vegetables. We were immediately enticed to grab a round of drinks, House Margarita for me and a Mezcal flight for my partner, as well as the pupusa sampler, a recommendation from our server.
